

Research Central //

Since MGH's first building, Bulfinch, opened in 1821 in Boston (below), the hospital has mushroomed around it and even extended to neighboring Charlestown (at right). Throughout both campuses, not far from beds and other space devoted to patient care, laboratories conducting basic research can be found. Disciplines as diverse as bioimaging, nerve injury research and molecular pharmacology are being explored across MGH's 23 acres of research space.

